The growth and dispersal of species across a fragmented landscape can be influenced by climatic and topographic factors. Such factors can be especially influential in mountain ecosystems, where climatic heterogeneity and topography combine to form a mosaic of biotic communities. To better understand the consequences of climate for species distributions, we conducted a hierarchical approach that combines comprehensive niche models, species distribution models and environmental correlative analysis. We used the comprehensive niche models of 70,000 Digital Elevation Models of the Alps, which can be derived from climate proxies, to create species distribution models for 211 alpine species. We related the composition of these species distribution models and the environmental conditions of the Alpine Foreland to altitude and topography using correlative analysis, to explain species distribution. We found that 23% of the species distribution models were significantly correlated with altitude
