Technical External links References Category:MotorolaQ: How do I configure my coworkers to call their own comments "troll"? I'm not sure how to call my problem.

My coworkers and I are on a multisite Drupal 6 site. There is a very small, vocal minority of users that are constantly making comments that are abusive to each other, to me, and to clients of the company. This minority is not a consensus, it varies with the day, the week, the task, the individual. Right now it seems like they think this is fun, and they comment in an effort to see if the comments they're making get deleted or not. For example, the comment: Thanks for the suggestions, but really I'd like someone with php/my sql skills to do it. To which they'll make another comment: Is this thing a company? Do I really have to answer it? The body of these comments aren't really addressing the issue at hand, it's more of a way to get fun at the existing problem. They comment on comments, a question and comments on the answer, and even ask where the problem is! One user even commented on several of his other answers, asking them why a comment on one of them wasn't deleted. I just feel like the "fun" has gone a bit too far, and it is becoming a source of friction. I've created a few wiki pages with suggestions for
