The effects of bending gyrification index on pain outcome in patients with mechanical low back pain. The aim of this study was to determine whether gyrification index (GI) change differed among patients with mechanical low back pain (LBP) who experienced pain relief after intensive spine education. The participants in this study comprised LBP patients who underwent the educational intervention and assessed to have an effective pain-reducing effect. To measure the changes in the GI values, we used a 3-dimensional magnetic resonance imaging (MRI) scanner at 1.5T. The patients were randomly assigned to 2 groups: the intervention group, which underwent a 10-week educational program for 2 h per week, and the education group, which received only 10 weeks of general education in the same 2 hours, in addition to their previous educational intervention. Analysis of variance (ANOVA) and a Student-Newman-Keuls (SNK) test were used to examine the differences in changes in the GI values in the intervertebral discs between the intervention and education groups. Compared with the education group, the GI value in the intervertebral disc at the C4-
