Embodiments of the present invention relate to a device for labeling containers having improved clamping. More particularly, embodiments of the present invention relate to a compact, highly reliable glue applicator that provides precise control in the application of multiple label stocks during the labeling process. In the labeling of containers, such as beer or beverage bottles, it is desirable to apply a label from a continuous roll of label stock that is dispensed from a turntable on which a number of label rollers are mounted. Once a label is applied to a container, the label is held by a vacuum applied to the underside of the label, where it is severed from the supply of continuous labels by means of a blade that is typically fixed to the vacuum source, such as a vacuum pump. Typically, the labeling process requires that a number of different label stocks be applied to the container in succession. However, there are a number of disadvantages associated with the use of a fixed blade arrangement in a system that requires a number of labels to be applied to the container. For example, the blade arrangement cannot be easily adjusted, and the blade must be replaced after each label stock is applied. Further, blade replacement is time consuming, and once replaced, the blade must be aligned with respect to the edges of the label stock. Another disadvantage associated with prior art devices is that in order to apply a label stock to a container, a position on the container must be set, and the vacuum attached to the label stock must be applied to that position. This requires a relatively large amount of space within the labeling device. Another drawback to prior art devices is that the inherent vibration of the components of the labeling device, such as air blasts used to apply a vacuum to the label stock, can cause unwanted marking on the container. Accordingly, there is a need for a device for labeling containers that is compact, easy to use and does not require a relatively large amount of space within the labeling device.

Anesthesia in microsurgery. Brief reports of effective microsurgical techniques and anesthesia are presented. The observations and experiences at the Oregon Surgical Society from the period 1984 through 1990 were tabulated. Records of patients undergoing 137 microsurgical or stereotactic procedures were reviewed. Anesthetic effectiveness and safety were assessed. These included all primary and adjunctive techniques used in the 60 operative procedures not requiring hypothermia during prolonged surgery. Of the 137 procedures, 98 (71.5%) were not hypothermic. All the latter procedures were in
